

A ring whose story is never finished From Brussels to Saudi Arabia

Katherine Berquin will bring her internationally patented Reflection Collection to the Belgian Royal Economic Mission from 21 to 26 November 2026.

BRUSSELS — Choosing a precious ring to mark an important moment, then giving it new meaning without replacing the jewel. This is the idea behind the Reflection Collection. In November, Brussels-based jewellery designer Katherine Berquin will take this internationally patented concept to Saudi Arabia. She wants to explore how her approach to personal luxury is received and meet potential retail partners.

The ring is finished; its story remains open. The wearer can change the central gemstone herself, easily and securely. These Milestones of Life are chosen separately and can be collected over the years. A birth, a love, an achievement or a new beginning can each find a place in the same jewel. A colour that appeals to the wearer can also be reason enough to choose a different stone.

“A woman should not have to fit her jewellery. Her jewellery should reflect her.”
— Katherine Berquin

The collection comprises eight core ring designs in 18-carat gold, with or without diamonds. The form and precious material provide continuity; the interchangeable stone allows room for change. Berquin offers her own answer to the question of how a jewel can remain personal as the wearer’s life evolves.

How might a concept born in Brussels find its place among women in Saudi Arabia? During the mission, Katherine plans to speak with retailers and luxury professionals about jewellery choices, meaningful gifts and their clients’ expectations. These conversations will help establish where the concept resonates and which partners can communicate it.

Her ambition is deliberately selective: a limited number of high-end retail partners who value personal advice. Katherine intends to support their sales teams herself in presenting the collection, changing the Milestones and telling the story behind the jewel.
